SCFE 5303. Anti-Oppress & Anti-Racist Ed.
This course surveys major concepts and issues in education in terms of anti-oppressive education, including anticolonial, anti-racist, queer, and critical pedagogy approaches. Beginning with theoretical analyses, the course then moves to practical anti-oppressive pedagogical strategies aimed at change in schools, classrooms, and community settings. By grounding theoretical principles in actual pedagogical practices, this course opens pathways to educational transformation.

This course focuses on the foundational ideas of Critical Race Theory (CRT) from its origins in Critical Legal Studies to its current debates and evolutions in education. Students will explore LatCrit, which is one of the key branches of CRT. This course orients students to CRT and LatCrit as frameworks for exposing the ways in which power is distributed and exercised in educational settings, as well as understanding the ways in which racism is endemic to society and education.

SCFE 5307. Lang, Race & Culture in Ed.
This course explores language, race, and culture as co-constitutive forces that shape identities across a wide variety of contexts and communities. Building on sociolinguistic and anthropological understandings, this course incorporates the field of raciolinguistics to theorize race and culture through language studies, examining how the relationship between race and language impacts domains like education and politics. In so doing, students will consider the ways in which identity hierarchies and inequality more generally are (re)produced in educational spaces.

This course uses critical theories to analyze the intersections of race, class and the environment and how these (re)produce educational inequities in historically marginalized communities. It will examine how environmental racism differently impacts educational spaces on the U.S.-Mexico border and the implications for educational access, opportunities and outcomes among diverse fronterizx and transfronterizx students and their communities. Students will also explore policies and efforts that have been successful in redressing educational inequities directly related to environmental racism.

SCFE 5317. Border as Place & Space.
This course analyzes place-based pedagogies and educational spaces in transnational contexts, including perceived theoretical, historical, geographic, and philosophical borders. Place-based and space-based education will be explored as interdisciplinary and serving as the foundation for understanding and engaging in local, regional, national, and global issues. The focus is on students transgressing previously accepted boundaries in order to live and work sustainably in their own communities.

SCFE 5320. Socio Cult Fndtions of Educ.
Socio Cultural Foundations of Education (3-0) Explores the social, historical, and philosophical foundations of formal education, as well as how current discourses and teachers’ and students’ subjectivities shape the everyday praxis of schooling. Critical perspectives from various theoretical traditions are brought to bear on the question of how to transform schools into institutions that foster democratic pedagogies, social justice, and the creation of an active, participatory citizenry. Students will learn to interrogate and deconstruct popular assumptions around schooling, learning, race, and “ability,” as they work toward deepening the liberatory potential of their own pedagogical practice.

Emancipatory Critical Pedagogy: This course dialectically constructs knowledge related to emancipatory critical pedagogies. It promotes the identification of oppressive hegemonic social structures that produce alienation and the rethinking of educational praxis embedded in possibilities of inclusion that reinvent education as transformational rather than a transmission of knowledge. High priority is given to the development of critical thinking and the reinvention of democratic alternatives in order to facilitate the study of educational issues with a well-informed critical eye.

SCFE 5322. Economics of U.S. Schooling.
Economics of U.S. Schooling (3-0) This course will examine the changing economic context of K-12 education in the U.S., including policies around school financing, the increasing presence of private corporations in public schools, and proposals to channel public resources to private schools. Students will gain a deeper, historically-informed understanding of how public education fits within larger social structures. By examining the important socioeconomic changes affecting schools, students will reflect on the social aims of schooling, and what such changes imply for schools’ role in the expansion of democratic practice and the maintenance of a vibrant public sphere.

Freirean Pedagogy and Social Justice: This course explores Freirean pedagogy as a source of inspiration for anti-oppressive and revolutionary teaching around the world. The course will examine the possibilities and limitations of Freirean pedagogy for helping people name and change social and educational realities premised upon injustices. It looks at the work of those who apply, extend, and critique the Freirean perspective and offers a unique transdisciplinary, multidisciplinary, and interdisciplinary approach that promotes social justice and the science of wellbeing—which are based on better distribution of resources.

SCFE 5324. Student Engagement in Learning.
Student Engagement in Learning (3-0) This course examines the ways in which the social curriculum impacts students’ academic performance in the classroom. Examining the variables that foster student engagement and disengagement in learning are necessary in order to help educators develop effective classroom management practices. Topics include racial and ethnic diversity, oppositional culture, students at risk, the school culture, teacher attitudes, and the social and emotional variables that affect student learning. The course provides practical classroom applications for engaging students to learn in K-12.

SCFE 6322. Economics of U.S. Schooling.
This course examines the economic context of schooling in the U.S., such as: Changing policies around schooling financing, the increasing presence of private corporations in public schools, and proposals to channel public resources to private schools represent a major shift in the organization of education in this country. However, despite the public controversies around these processes, relatively very few empirical educational research has been generated, making it appealing for doctoral students to contemplate academic work in this area. The course studies various facets of the economic framework of public education, while at the same time analyzing the links between them. Restricted to major of PHD-TLC. Restricted to level of DR.

This course engages the thinking of Paulo Freire, who was unarguably one of the most important educational contemporary philosophers. People struggling for liberation in all parts of the world have engaged Freire as a key educational component of their political projects. This course considers what are the possibilities and limitations of Freirean pedagogy for helping people name and change a social and educational reality premised upon inequality. Also, the course looks at the work of those who apply, extend, critique, and reinvent the Freirean perspectives. This class offers a unique transdisciplinary, multidisciplinary, and interdisciplinary approach. Restricted to major of PHD-TLC. Restricted to level of DR.

SCFE 6342. Foundation of Media Education.
This course consists of a critical exploration of the influences that news and popular media exert on society as related to various aspects of multicultural diversity and media literacy. Based primarily on social studies concepts and analyses, among the issues explored will be the formation of opinion, the projection of images, the process of stereotyping, and the exertion of power, as well as the intersection of racial, ethnic, gender and class identities. Readings will also include an introduction to both quantitative and qualitative approaches to media research methods when applied to the critical analyses of film, radio, television, news media, popular music, social media and other forms of mass communication. SCFE 6344. Ethics in Education.
This course explores human ethics within educational contexts. It assists students to reflect on their own praxis and experiences to develop humane values of self-determination and self-realization. It examines fundamental ontological nature of student, educator, and teacher identity, to then deconstruct “social amnesia” of individualism and its effects on collective’s “social determination and sociological imaginary” within contexts of post-colonial contemporary society. The course addresses the political underpinnings schooling in a globalizing world. Ultimately it proposes transformative possibilities of anti-dialectic to dialectic approaches to pedagogy for social justice. Prerequisite: Departmental approval required. Restricted to level of DR.

SCFE 6346. History of Education.
This course examines major events that shaped schooling and policy making in the U.S. from the colonial period to the present, focusing on educational ideas and practices in the perspective of social and intellectual history. The course provides both knowledge of the history of American education and an appreciation of historical perspectives as ways of understanding contemporary education. The course examines how education is shaped and is influenced by a struggle among competing forces and goals; lending itself to a consideration of social, political, cultural, religious, and economic factors. It treats the changing character of education in the context of broader social and cultural developments, as part of an effort to understand how education came to take on its current forms and functions. Prerequisite: Departmental approval required. Restricted to level of DR.
